Bis an die Szene bewaffnet!!! It's a groaner of a pun that only works in German, but captures the feel of this EP perfectly. So there you go. If you want it explained, we recommend you track down Dapayk, genial maker of simply devastating techno for labels including Orac, Trapez, Karloff, and his own Mo's Ferry. His new record, hot on the heels of the Dapayk & Padberg album, "Black Beauty," is a different side of his work: a very personal and cinematic dancefloor trip.

The epic title track of this EP is eleven minutes long and makes good use of every second. A meticulously composed prelude of dubbed-out crackles and rumbles gives way to a martial beat, liquid synth sounds and spatial, organic percussion. A hypnotic and ill late-night stomper, a track that tells a story with carefully placed sounds.

"Saaa" continues the dark cabaret vibe, but aims its weaponry straight at this Winter's more adventurous dance floors, bringing in filtered housey chords, some not at all housey percussion, and sudden visits from a warped horn section. Raucous yet confidently restrained stuff, slow-burning dance floor psychedelia.

"Way" pushes this wonderful little EP father into techno-cinema territory. In the Western genre, to be precise. A sleepy swirling sample collage begins the track, arranged around a recurring guitar wave. The voice of a lonely old cowboy echoes across the prairie, and then the beat kicks up just a notch with the ever so tasty patter of acoustic drums. Fantastic, evocative stuff that reminds us of Wishmountain—danceable if you're in the mood.
